The amount diminishes regularly with age in most cases, though there are not wanting examples where the amount remains nearly constant until late in the life of the leaf, when it suddenly disappears. Since distillation after maceration yields more HCN than direct distillation, it is evident that a part at least, and as experiments indicate most or all, of the HCN exists in the form of a glucoside which is split up by an enzyme. No matter how quickly the killing and distillation is carried on, the glucoside is hydrolyzed, so that the enzyme acts with astonishing rapidity. Some study was made of the enzymes concerned, but these must be worked out later. That HCN is a reserve is shown by the fact that in plants put into obscurity sufficient to preclude photosynthesis, HCN diminishes after the third day; and when the same plants are brought out into the light again it increases. Further, the maximum content of HCN occurs at midday. Light is influential only because it provides for the making of glucose, which is necessary...
