Nobody knows exactly what the actual crime rate is in America but everybody knows it is too high. 1 In fact, total crime rates in the USA are significantly higher than in other industrialized countries. By 1998, nearly six million people almost 3% of the adult population were under some form of correctional supervision.² These developments have had important consequences for criminal justice institutions. More than 1000 new prisons have been built in the United States since 1980. Today state prisons are forced to operate above their capacity. If you have a closer look at the criminal justice system of the United States you could get the impression that crime is the product and punishment is the answer. Especially conservative politicians, together with the mass media and activists in the victim rights movement advanced that the criminal justice system has become more and more punitive since the late 1960s. This development is documented at great length. In order to explain the increasing crime rates, most criminologists and sociologists have devoted their attention to examining the causes of crime. The scientific and public discussion about how to stop crime is going to be continued because there is no definitive recipe for a safer society. Nevertheless, it is undisputed that crime must be prevented. This paper deals with Megan's Law which was enacted in the United States to prevent the...
