BalboaPress. Paperback. Book Condition: New. Paperback. 120 pages. Dimensions: 9.0in. x 6.0in. x 0.3in. My mothers words are simple. At times I have tried to improve them with more colorful language, more complex descriptions. But I stopped myself more often than not; because reading her words over and over, trying to improve them, I found it difficult to better describe the transformation of this skinny little olive-skinned girl with the big dark eyes and the long chestnut hair- a little girl who adored her family and found solace and comfort in a sprawling Victorian home. A home decorated with carefully selected treasures that served as her source of stability, refuge and belonging. Over time her universe changed. She lost many of the people and things she adored, only to find her self thrown into a world where she was no longer the youngest, the delicate flower Dahlia. As she morphed from Dahlia to Zat, to Dale, Mommy and Grammy, she came dangerously close to losing herself. That's when the delicate flower finally stood up and strengthened to become the tough old Crow I love. And that amazes me more each day. Dahlia still holds those memories of warm mahoganies and lace curtains, and the crevices where a little girl could hide, reading her books and making believe. I'm grateful she has shared them with me, and can't help but grin watching her bask in that sweet glow of happiness. I have my memories too, of a mother I could always cuddle with, a lap that never refused to gently rock me out of whatever drama I conjured. And as my daughter snuggles with me after a long day at school or an intense game of basketball, I hope I can provide her as much comfort as my mother did me, along with the ability to...
